Guests

Writers and the community as a whole were gladdened by a visit recently of Anais Nin, who spoke about new techniques and structures and the use of the unconscious in writing, and the responsibility of a writer. She conferred generously with individuals and carried away with her a couple of manuscripts. She was particularly interested in the print shop, since she and her husband hand-set all of her works for years before they were sought by a commercial publisher. She believes that the influence upon writing would be for the best if every writer had to print some of his own works.

Marguerite and Franz Wildenhain, potters from Pondfarm, California, were recent guests of Trude Guermonprez. Mrs. Wildenhain spoke informally to the community about ceramics and exhibited some of the Pondfarm pottery. Both were glad to meet the Albers after twenty-five years, since all had studied together at the Bauhaus.

John Allcott, head of the Art Department at the University of North Carolina, and his wife, June, were week-end visitors in October, coming particularly to see modern architecture at BMC and to arrange for an exhibit of BMC architecture at the University in late January. A group of students with the help of Ted Dreier are preparing the exhibit. The weaving department has already sent an exhibit of textiles for an exhibit there.

Professor William Morse Cole was on the campus for three weeks making the annual audit of the college books. Printed reports will be mailed to those interested in receiving them.

Drama

A drama course given by Art Penn is the result of the successful production last spring of three one-act plays through the inspired initiative of the students. Penn, who directed the plays, asked to give a course this fall and has about twenty working with him. As a student-teacher Penn is getting it from both sides now.
